by Naomi Fata

Whether doctors, clerks, housewives, business people ..... rich or poor, the response seems to be the same when we open the mailbox to find yet another white envelope with clear plastic over the address that reads in bold print BILL ENCLOSED. We're frustrated that just when it seems we might get ahead there is yet another company demanding our money; we're afraid that there might not be enough to pay for groceries if we pay this bill in full.

Concern about the dollar - whether we have enough for the month, enough for the kid's college, or enough for the dream vacation - plagues most all of us.

This anxiety causes us to clutch onto what we have, to hold on with fists balled up and head down, as if this will make it multiply in our hands.

Is there not a supernatural law that is oft forgotten, one that looks to the Giver of all things? When we look up, let go, and trust, doesn't something extraordinary take place as trust creeps in and worry dissipates?

Worry kills, steals, and destroys not just the day, but often the physical body as well, bringing sickness, high-blood pressure and lack of sleep. On the other hand, there is TRUST .... I wonder if in the simple trust we cause a smile to spread on His face and cause His hands to open wide, as He begins to work in ways we cannot see. In trust we let go and let God.
